GEARY'S UNCHARITABLENESS.

James Geary, in the beautiful idiom of the street has "flew the coop" and left the members of the "French Spy" company stranded. All this happened Wedneeday in Lansing. Charies H. Haile, one of the teading members of the troups was in the city last night on his way to Chicago. Mr. Haile was not exactly on the stock train, but as be himself admitted he was so near to it that the rumble of the wheels could be heard. Mr. Haile's opinion of Mr. Geary would not be fit for publication, but it is a model of unwavering good faith.

Geary would not be fit for publication, but it is a model of unwavering good faith.

"It was a little the rankest thing I ever heard of," remarked Mr. Haile. "Geary had been kicking about business for several weeks. He complained in Grand Rapids of losing business, although we had fairly good houses. At Toledo we did well, and had nothing to complain of in Jackson. We were sent from there to Lansing, but when we arrived Colonel James was not with us. He had hied himself hence and no-body knew where he was at. We were two weeks behind in our salaries and nearly every member of the company was flat broke. When we found that Geary had skipped some of the boys attached Nellie Davenport's baggage. The prise beauty, you know, travels as Jim's wife. Nellie kicked when her stuff was saized and swore in court that she was not Geary's wife. That settled it, and we could not touch any of her effects. T. R. Wallace and his wife, whose stage name is Ermi Melville, were taken care of by Geary. The rest of us got it where the chicken got the an. The scenery was attached, but we couldn't wait to realize anything on that. I had a little money I'd saved, and by saking my overcout I raised enough to get myself and Townsend out of tows. Townsend started for Chicago with $2 to spare, so he'll hardly be able to spend the summer in unrestrained luxury. I'm on my way to Chicago, in the hope of striking something there, I am going with Robert Downing next season; but a man has to live until fall. If tieary had had no stuff it would have been different. We'd all stood by him and walked to the world's fair together if necessary. But when a man has rocks and gives his company the aneak like that, he's a bad man. There is a funny side to the whole business, which the public may be able to see, but a man who is forced to live on coal smoke and unfiltered water can hardly be expected to appreciate the humor of the situation."
